

The Temple of Many Faces

Austin Rode and David Stucker

Contents of Room 2:

- A silver ten-speed Schwinn bicycle
- A brain in a green-ish glass jar, which communicates telepathically, but incomprehensively.
- A black sword
- An alien musical instrument, unable to be played by humanoid-life. Its exact function is unknown.
- A tablet engraved in three languages, none of which you understand
- A ten-foot pole
- A fire extinguisher
- An obsidian mirror
- A functional but empty cryogenic chamber
- A spinning gyroscope
- A book of astrology for a foreign galaxy
- A deep-sea diving suit

GM's Note: The temple itself is an immutable extradimensional space, as old as time itself, with entrances that appear in many disparate worlds. Due to its unique nature, it has housed a collection of strange lifeforms, weird artifacts, wondrous technology, and far-flung travelers, some of which are still present. Its shape indicates some relationship to the primordial force of chaos.

Entrance: The entrance is exposed at the base of a mountain, seemingly positioned as if the stone itself has formed around it. The pillars are crumbling and weathered, as if it is impossibly ancient. One jar contains a jeweled dagger and an octagonal gold ring, the others are empty.

1: Three stone jars stand in the corner, and bas relief engravings of figures on chariots on the walls. A troll has made its home in this chamber and will attack upon entry.

2: The central chamber; the hub of the complex. It is full of unrecognizable mechanical and technological objects, along with alien pieces of art — though it's uncertain at a glance which is which. The room is so full as to be hard to move around in. Items in this chamber include (but are not limited to) those found on the table at the bottom left.

3: The door to this chamber is difficult to open, buckling in on itself. Inside, a large and unrecognizable tree is growing through the chamber, wrapping everything in thick vines originating from its opposite end. A low hissing sound can be heard from the vines, and they whip out and attempt to snare anyone that ventures within striking distance, ripping anyone so unfortunate apart and dragging the remains to flower-like “mouths” that along the walls. The opposite door opens to an alien jungle of hostile plant life.

4: On the floor is a book; upon opening, it contains detailed narratives of the lives of every living thing to ever live, as if the pages never run out. The opposite door reveals hills of ash and dust. The air is thin and smells of ozone.

5: This chamber is flooded, with ankle-deep water teeming with alien fish and aquatic life. The door opens to a tide pool on an alien coast where three orange suns rise over a green sea. The sand is black like coal. The shallows are safe. The depths are not.

6: The doors are incredibly difficult to open, opening to a chamber without oxygen or gravity; the exterior door is open, and the starry blackness of space is visible. Once a gap is open in the doors, air rushes out. If they manage to get the doors open, they are sucked into space.

7: A large metallic throne facing the exterior door, upon which sits a dome-like crown. There is a control panel and two levers nearby. One lever electrocutes anyone sitting in the chair, the other gives strange visions of the past, the future, and distant worlds. The door opens halfway up a cliff face, overlooking the ruins of a marble city.

8: This room contains the desiccated remains of alien explorers — five or six beings with large heads and black eyes, their skin having turned translucent and paper-like, through which their internal organs and skeleton can be seen. The opposite door is barred from the other side.

9: A strange beast shambles out of this chamber; on its left side, it has seven tentacles, on its right, an arm with two elbows that ends in a large hand with six fingers and two thumbs. Its head is a single large eye surrounded by fangs. Its body is covered with patches of scales, with the rest of its skin being smooth and excreting a slimy mucus. One leg is bent back like a dog's leg and ends in a single talon, the other is large and thick, like an elephant's leg, without joints. In the center of its chest is a large opening from which it breathes and speaks. The open door on the opposite side of the room leads to a plane of endless green flame, the sky a dark purple.